Among the victims of this burning climate was a carabinier, who was known to many persons of the detachment.

Many of his comrades who approached him for the last time, either to inherit what he Conjuring being a complete Hand-Book of Par-had left, or to bid him adieu, were amazed to lor Magic, illustrated with over 500 wood find his limbs flexible, and something flexible around his heart.

To this must be added requisitions of all kinds by the Generals of the enemy, who wards the frontier; and which the treasury as a Text Book for the Mechanic, Architect, En loaded whole wagons which they sent tohad ultimately to pay for. The total was more than 1,500,000,000 francs. One might, one should almost have feared, that such large payments, collected from day to day, would have produced want in the treasury, a sequently all the evils which befall a country that has no money while it owes much.

"Alas!" said the rich, as they saw the wagons going to the Rue Vivienne for its load, "all our money is emigrating—we are Adele, a Tale, by Julia Kavanagh, au utterly ruined-all our undertakings will fail, and we will not be able to borrow. There will be nothing but rain and civil death."

The result contradicted all these fearsthe payments, to the amazement of financiers, were made without trouble-public credit increased, and all hurried after loans. During the period of this superpurgation, the course of exchange, an infallible measure of the circulating of money, was in our favor. This was an arithmetical proof that more money came into France than went out of it, What came to our aid? What divinity operated this miracle? Gourmandise. When the Britons, Teutons, Cimmerians and Seythes made an irruption into France, they came with extreme voracity and with stomachs of uncommon capacity.

They were not long contented with viands furnished them by a forced hospitality, but aspired to more delicate enjoyments. The Queen City became ere long one vast refectory. The new comers ate in shope, cafes, restaurante, and even in the streets. They gorged themselves with meat, fish, game, trufflee, pastry and truit.

Superficial observers could not account for this eating without hunger, which seemed limitless. All true Frenchmen, however, rubbed their hands and said: "They are under the charm; they have spent this evening more money than they took from the Treasury this morning." This epoch was favorable to all those who contributed to the gratification of taste. Very made his fortune, Archard laid the foundation of his, and Madame Sullot, whose shop in the Palais Royal was not twenty feet square, sold twelve thousand petits pates in one day .- Brillat
